

Letters of recommendation should be submitted by professional sources (such as former/current faculty or employers) and address the following: (a) the applicant's ability to succeed academically in a graduate program, (b) scholarly or creative potential, and (c) aspects of personality and characteristics significant to graduate study.